Call to Action is Passé, Call to Value add is the New Thing!

In today’s world, everyone is looking for the value that one can get from the products, services or in employees while recruiting. “Call to Action” means motivating the user to take a certain action whereas “Call to Value” means showing how the user will be benefitted by using your products or services. Call to action is seller centric but call to value is customer centric.

Let’s look at how the change of approach has turned out to be gold for “Apple” in the below interesting case.

Over the last couple of years, we have become more knowledgeable about what happens to our data.

Many consumers are now worried about the amount of data that Facebook, Amazon, and Google have about them. And Apple has stepped in now to assure all of us to find a safer alternative by approaching us with few stronger brand communications such as –

Your privacy is safe with us.

What happens on your iPhone, stays on your iPhone.

As Ben Evans put it: “The old Apple promise was that you don’t have to worry if the tech works. The new promise is you don’t have to worry if the tech is scamming you.”

A company’s value proposition is as important as a person’s soul. As everything is about marketing and you all would be giving interview sooner, so let me use a simple example to explain the statement “Call to Action is Passé, Call to Value add is the New Thing.”

During the interview, you will be in the shoes of a seller, so don’t tell what you can get from the organization instead try to convey how you can add value to the organization (user).

This approach from Seller-Centric to Customer-Centric will be the knocking six in every situation.

Now, I will leave you with this curiosity to move yourself a ladder up with this approach in career!

Good Luck!

GLBIMR keeps organizing various events every week and that is keeping us more involved and interested while working towards our goal, And also managed to complete the course by organizing online classes and taking online exams. It was a great experience being connected with college through Mentoring Program. Also the institute played a great role in increasing the morale of students by organizing various online webinars which helped us to remain positive throughout this tough situation.
